

How to practise with refugees in Social Work Field?

Guler Gunes

Globalization is associated with the flow. One of these flows is human flow as Appadurai "called ethnospace". In this age most people live beyond limits. One group of these people consists of international forced migrants as refugees. Although the limits are fluid in this age, refugees are stopped somewhere or they are incarcerated to a certain point. This can be said to be locked in a bondage to another. These people have to do obligatory trips; they are unwanted guests at where they arrived. Refugees are people who are ignored by communities and a lot of the profession especially politicians. At this point, social work has to take over this problem's solution.

How should and with which roles social work practise with refugees as being advocates of the victims? In this article it will be attempted to find the answer to this problem.
